

Sermon for July 22, 2018 – “A Picture of Grace”

16th Sunday in OT, Year B – Texts: Genesis 32:3 – 33:11, (Luke 10:38-42)

Rev. Jeff Colarossi, Westwood First Presbyterian Church

As we read scripture during worship week in and week out and consider its meaning and relevance for our lives we often find that there are many layers of meaning. They often take us deeper, well beyond what’s immediately obvious, often challenging the ways we’ve previously heard and understood them. With that in mind I submit to you today’s story of Jacob at the river Jabbock. We might just assume that it’s a story about Jacob and what happens to him on that strange night when he wrestled with a man who seemed like God Himself. Nothing more. Nothing less. That may be fine if we take that part of the story on its own. But, we cannot seriously hear what this story is saying or, more importantly what the author of this sophisticated tale is trying to tell us if we don’t place that struggle in its context and pay attention to everything he says about what happened. Jacob’s famous struggle at the place he ended up calling Peniel because of the wound he received there was meant to be heard in the context of what comes both before it and afterward. Furthermore, it may not even be the most important part of the story even though it’s received all of the attention.

After twenty, long-suffering years trying to get a wife for himself from his uncle Laban, Jacob is on his way back to the land of his ancestors, the land his father had given him, the land God had promised. More importantly, he’s on his way back to everything he’d stolen from his big brother Esau. The last time Jacob had seen Esau, Esau wanted to straight up kill him; pure and simple. Kill him for stealing the birthright and the family blessing. Kill him for the sleazy way he’d gone about it. Esau knew a liar and a cheat when he saw one and wasn’t afraid to say how he felt about it. Jacob had shamed his family, and what’s more, he’d gotten away with it. Jacob even profited from being a fugitive managing to make a bundle by putting one over on his uncle. Leaving home on the run with nothing but the shirt on his back, he returns as a prosperous tribal chief with wives, children, servants and livestock as big as a small army. It was an impressive sight and Jacob was clearly counting on that, counting on impressing his dim-witted brother Esau. Problem is, he sees Esau coming to meet him with 400 armed men! And that’s when he has his famous experience with the strange night visitor.

Now, a lot of ink has flowed, and sermons been preached about that dark, troubling encounter. Was it a man Jacob struggled with or an angel? Was it God himself? What kind of blessing did Jacob want from the man? What kind of blessing did he receive? Did he receive it? And if he did, how did it change him? We’re left to wonder about much of the encounter, especially if we don’t remember it in the context of what happens next. For the very next day Jacob finally gets to meet Esau and things somehow seem clearer in the light of day. He wakes up and joins his family and it’s then that he sees Esau coming to him. This time instead of playing the coward, instead of hiding behind his wives and children, Jacob tells them all to stand back while he goes on himself to meet Esau...alone and defenseless. It’s probably the gutsiest thing Jacob ever did, and probably the only time he tried to do anything not being entirely sure there was something in it for him. He just went alone to face the brother he’d cheated and betrayed not knowing what would happen next. It’s here that the storyteller turns the lens away from Jacob and focuses it squarely on his estranged brother Esau.

What will the rugged, impulsive Esau do now that Jacob is giving him the chance, especially after having had 20 years to think about it? One thing's certain, both of them had given some very serious thought to what Esau might do. But Esau ran to meet him, embraced him, fell on his neck and kissed him, and wept as the story says. I'm guessing that was probably the last thing Jacob was expecting. I'm guessing that never in his wildest dreams would Jacob ever have even dared to hope that Esau, the brother he'd treated so despicably, would forgive him. And not only forgive him but do it with such heartfelt tenderness. But that's just what the story says Esau did.

Esau – Big Red – the hairy, strong, macho-man with more appetite than brains, the one who couldn't see things coming until after he'd been hit over the head, gives his brother – ol' Jake the Snake - precisely more than he deserves once again. Only this time, it isn't because Esau's too stupid not to but because he simply wants to. My money says that this is high-point of the story. The famous struggle of Jacob's the night before is only the anti-climax. If Jacob, or any one of us, wondered whether the one Jacob had encountered at Peniel was God here Jacob has no doubts. When Esau asks Jacob why he has sent half of his property as a gift to him Jacob replies, “...for truly to see your face is like seeing the face of God.” In other words, whatever blessing Jacob may have asked for and received at Peniel, he saw in the tear-drenched face of his long-lost brother Esau and received here a blessing that was his only because it was freely given. An undeserved blessing freely given. We have a name for that sort of thing. Anyone know what it is? We call it GRACE.

Therefore, the love of God and love of a long-estranged brother or any family member or friend for that matter belong together. We can no more separate them than we can stand apart from the person every one of us is meant to be. This story is, in the end, one of incredible grace. Grace that we can never anticipate and with which we must struggle probably to the end of our days, or at least until we learn that we can never find what we really need until we find it in the faces of all those from whom we have been estranged. Especially in the face of God.

Such is the nature of grace. Different than justice when we get what we deserve. Different than mercy when we don't get what we deserve. Grace happens when we get what we don't deserve. Grace is God's unmerited favor. His goodness toward those who have no claim on it nor reason to expect it. It is, simply stated, a gift. Do we begin to see the picture? Many of us approach God as Jacob initially approached Esau. We come to worship, put money in the collection plate, occasionally read the Bible, pray from time to time. We try to do it right, to do the right thing. We try to live the right way and go forth. God asks us, “What's the meaning of all this?” We say, “We're trying to find grace in Your sight.” God lovingly responds, “I don't need any of this. All things are Mine. I don't need anything from you. I don't need you. You need Me. But because I love you I'm offering My grace and acceptance to you freely. It's based on My love, not your work.” Does anyone find this as overwhelming as I do? How could God love us so much?

When we truly recognize the magnitude of this grace do we take back our gifts? Do we say, “If this salvation is by grace, then why do anything?” Of course not! We love Him because He first loved us so says 1 John 4:19. Instead of trying to gain favor by God's service, we ask Him to please accept our gift as a thankful response to His grace. (Which, by the way, is what Stewardship's all about!)

So, the question for us is: Why are we serving God today? Are we like Jacob as he began with Esau, trying to gain God's favor? Are we like Martha when Jesus came to visit her and her sister Mary, so busy doing, so busy serving God, so concerned that the right things be done the right way in order to win God's favor that we're missing God Himself. The necessary thing, the better part? Or, are we like Jacob grew to be through this incident with Esau; so awed, amazed, and overwhelmed that God has accepted us and offered His amazing grace that we offer Him the gift of our lives as He offered us the gift of His Son? Are we willing to let our lives be changed? Transformed? By this gift of grace?

Goethe is quoted as saying that, "It is the nature of grace always to fill spaces which have been empty." That's what grace does and why grace is the key to understanding the story of the reunion of Jacob and Esau at the river Jabbock. It's there that Jacob finally gets it, that all God wants is us and our worship of Him. That's it.

What a picture of grace!

Thanks be to God.

Amen and amen.
